

Butterfly-shaped optical cables and drop optical cables

Article Overview

Yes, a butterfly-shaped optical cable is a type of drop optical cable commonly used for FTTH and last-mile network connections.

Structural Features

Butterfly-shaped optical cables are named for their flat, wing-like cross-sectional design, which typically includes optical fibers positioned at the center and parallel strength members on both sides. This configuration provides mechanical protection, flexibility, and a small bending radius, making it suitable for both indoor and outdoor installations. The outer sheath is often LSZH or PVC, optimized for fire safety indoors and UV resistance outdoors.

Drop Cable Classification

Drop cables are designed to connect the main distribution network to end users, often in FTTH (Fiber-to-the-Home) deployments. Butterfly-shaped cables fall into this category because they are compact, lightweight, and easy to install, with features that support direct user access and last-mile connectivity. They can be single-core or multi-core (1F, 2F, 4F) depending on the number of users or service requirements.
