

New Zealand Vibration Optical Cable

Article Overview

New Zealand is leveraging existing optical fibre networks for advanced seismic and vibration monitoring using technologies like FiberSense VIDAR and Distributed Acoustic Sensing.

FiberSense VIDAR Technology

FiberSense, in partnership with Vodafone New Zealand, has developed VIDAR (Vibration Detection and Ranging), a patented system that converts fibre optic cables into dense arrays of vibration sensors. This technology allows real-time monitoring of ground motion, infrastructure vibrations, and seismic events across urban areas such as Wellington. The system captures vibrations along fibre cables, enabling detection of earthquakes at street and building levels, and provides data for rapid response and infrastructure protection. VIDAR integrates optical fibre sensing, photonics, and AI to analyze vibrations over large geographical grids.

Distributed Acoustic Sensing (DAS) Experiments

In addition to VIDAR, New Zealand researchers are using Distributed Acoustic Sensing (DAS) to study seismic activity along the Alpine Fault in the South Island. DAS converts existing telecommunication fibre-optic cables into thousands of densely spaced ground-motion sensors. Pulses of light travel along the fibre, and vibrations caused by seismic waves modulate the scattered light, which is recorded at high resolution. This method allows scientists to map fault structures and detect small-scale seismic events that conventional seismometers might miss....
